

Project Name: AccessHealth

1. Introduction

- Access Health is a communication platform that provides access to health information and direction to its users. The goal of Access Health is to increase healthcare awareness in the community by providing healthcare specialists to respond to the users' questions and give advice to the users.
- Key features include a messaging feature to send messages back and forth and also eventually be able to keep a log of past messages. Another feature is also the sign in and sign up features to be able to create accounts to keep tracks of messages. This also leads to a contact page and an about us page.

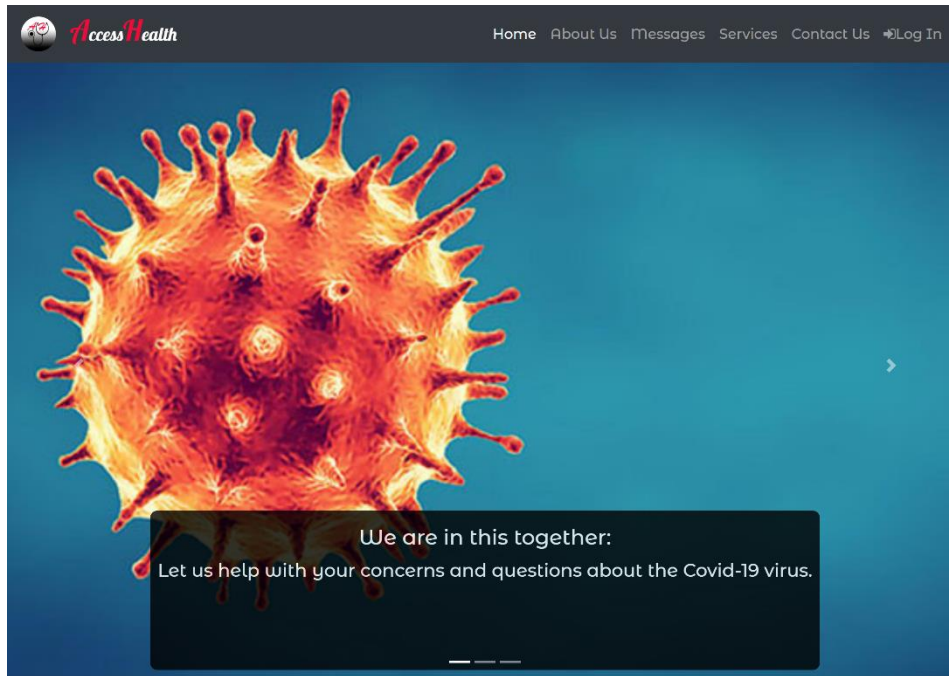

• 2. Design and Implementation

- In creating the design, the home page was an introduction to what Access Health is about and includes an introductory section of services offered. Services are the different specialties available and a health updating section.
- With the sign on and sign in design was created using modals and decided not to create a full page. These modals will link to each other and once depending on if the user in a return user or first-time user.
- I had an idea to create a jumbotron with the logo image as the background but decided to abort that idea due to positioning conflicts in implementing the design.
- Incorporating various components such as cards, containers, modals and carousel, I was able to make the web page as responsible as possible. My main breakpoint utilized was medium according to the bootstrap grids.

- In the future my possible alternatives to the components will be to include tabs and the collapse class when messages previous messages start to pile up.

3. Conclusions

- Personally, one big take away from me is the importance of adequate wire framing. I do understand that designs can change when it comes to coding but a general idea in the wire framing process makes is a lot easier to code. Also, I learned the importance of visualizing the audience in planning and designing.
- One of the best features of my project is the log in and sign-up forms. I believe they make a significant addition to the page. I also lie the simplicity of the page. I started off a lot more complex and had design issues. One of the downfalls is the messages page and I don't think I can do anything till later.
- In hindsight, I will spend less time trying to perfect the wireframing and write up all the content for the different pages prior to coding. This will allow me a smooth flow into the coding process.
